1. Introduction

The last two decades have witnessed a growth in research on accounting in less developed countries (LDCs). In particular, critical accounting scholarship in the area of management accounting in LDCs, though still in its infancy (Hopper and Bui 2015), has become an important field of research. Recently, LDCs have become interesting research sites in which to explore various management accounting dynamics associated with globalisation and neoliberal reforms, the diffusion of management accounting technologies, and the development of the management accounting profession and education (Hopper et al. 2009).

Given the politically and culturally rich idiosyncratic contexts of LDCs, a wide array of methodo-philosophical approaches has been deployed with different strategies for access, ethnographic encounters and theoretical sensitisation. Not surprisingly, LDCs' management accounting research has so far provided an interesting and diverse range of insights into how management accounting has been implicated within and outwith formal organisational settings. Many social theories, including orthodox Marxism, neo- and post-Marxism, Weber's interpretive sociology, Bourdieu's reflexive sociology, actor-network theory and various versions of institutional theory have been used to shed light on diverse understanding of management accounting practices. In this chapter, we aim to explore the particular theoretical trajectory that critical accounting research has taken to understand the political and cultural peculiarities of management accounting practices in LDCs, and potential paths for future investigation. Here, our primary attention is on the 'theorisation project'.
